

Calculated Risk - Factors to consider when riding in the backcountry.

Submitted by Eric Knoff on Mon, 03/28/2016 - 10:19

Snowmobiling in the mountains is risky business. Once a rider leaves the groomed trail and enters the uncontrolled and unpredictable realm of the backcountry, they immediately become exposed to a variety of hazards. One of the most inherent risks a backcountry rider confronts is the possibility of triggering or being caught in an avalanche since avalanche prone terrain often offers exciting riding opportunities. As a result, it is imperative that riders acquire proper skills to assess both the terrain and the snowpack - which will in turn facilitate better decision making when riding in the backcountry.

Calculated Risk.pdf

Publication

MSA

Date of Publication

Thursday 11/26/15